In the verandah, Phoebe.the humble cushion-bedded rar of a mot-time's room : a little gallery, printed with fine engravings, fair, bright, and costly. She went over the book lovingly, and took them from the drawer. I have to send this letter by your hands. It will serve to show you where I am. But I said to myself I will not fold up my life and leavers. And since I am now twenty-four, there must be a long delay before I can hope to have my heart's desire. I can hardly believe that I am writing to you, darling, dear love. I shall probably not see you again for some time, when if I follow my inclinations I shall be married to another; but I shall always think of you and love you dearly. We shall probably go back to England a year ago; and when we returned I was so very miserable, you see, that I could not be happy anywhere, but only in England, my own beloved country, which I shall never see again. So there I had to be miserable, and out of respect to you, I had to affect to be content with everything, and to be quiet and content. I must not complain, and I felt it very cruelly. I had to be patient, lest I should vex you. I felt that the trials of my early life were but a commencement of the battle, and that in the end I must conquer. I became rather a puzzle to myself. I could never trust myself, nor know what I felt or believed. One time I tried to turn a deaf ear to your love, another time I gave myself up to pleasure and was ready to throw my life away, and all that is most precious to my mind. You cannot think how
